Course Description

The course aims at providing a broad interdisciplinary introduction to development studies. The course offers a base for further detailed studies on development issues. The subject of development studies is the development process in the 'developing world' especially in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. The definition of the concept "development" is controversial, but its core idea is improvement in human well-being. Development studies operate on a very broad plane, and there are many ways of approaching and analyzing this discipline.

Course Description

This course provides a critical and rigorous introduction to the history of development studies as a multi-disciplinary subject tracing its origin and evolution in the broader intellectual history of social sciences in general. This course focuses particularly on the intellectual history of ‘development’ as a concept denoting both development as the process of ‘managed change’ in the Global South and development as the process of ‘social transformation’ in the post-colonial societies. It also reviews the history of the development of world economic systems and the impact of these developments on less advanced countries. Overall, it critically examines the notion of development discourse including the paradigm shift and internal conflicts within the discipline along with its contemporary relevance to development policy and practice.
